

Sweet Success

Thought Leadership • April 24, 2014

How a temple prevailed in the battle over a geographical indication for its famous confection, Tirupati laddus. In February 2014, a four-page order by a single judge of the Madras High Court provided closure in a little known, albeit significant, dispute between a trust that manages one of India's most visited temples, at Tirupati in the Tirumala Hills of Andhra Pradesh, and a restaurant in Chennai. The dispute centred on the intellectual property rights for an item of food that India had awarded geographical indication status to in 2009: a ball-shaped sweet, a laddu, available only at the temple in Tirupati. Around 125,000 laddus prepared every day within the temple compound, the outcome of the case was to have a profound impact on millions of temple goers, and the GI regime itself. Contribution by MS Bharath and Gowri Tirumurti. This article was published in India Business Law Journal April 2014. To continue reading, please contact us at email@anandandanand.com

